Cool email signatures templates

I love this analogy Slate uses to describe baffling another common practice of including your email in your email signature. It's like placing two return address stickers on an envelope. Or, at the party, rebuild yourself after the host has already done so. Mary, it's Kevin. Hey, Mary. My name is Kevin. This is an unnecessary waste of space because: Almost every email client, hovering over the sender's name, will display the address unless it is already visible. You can always just hit the answer. Save real estate for something that actually adds value – i.e. links to social media profiles, your company blog, your portfolio, etc. 3. To include images (and don't shy away from color) People remember visuals better than text. But there's a certain type of picture that can make your email signature particularly memorable. See that beautiful hill below below? You're probably going to forget it. You will most likely remember it. This is because studies show that the most memorable photos are those that contain people. Psychologists have also found that color images are more memorable than black and white. Bottom line: Consider putting a face to your name if you want to stand out from the crowd. 4. Try Sent from my iPhone team at Stanford researchers recently studied the perceived reliability of misspelled emails sent with (and without) sent from my iPhone signature. One big takeaway: Using an iPhone stock signature could help improve your image. What the researchers found is that when emails use proper grammar, spelling and punctuation, the sender is considered highly reliable – regardless of whether they're writing from their phone or computer. However, the study participants granted greater credibility to the person who wrote the sloppy email signed sent from my iPhone. These were more forgiving errors, as seen in the diagram: So does this 19-character disclaimer really offer a free pass from writing detailed answers? Our advice is to find out to your audience. For every person who wants to look the other way, there's another who sees it as an annoying form of humble boast. Bottom line: Don't be afraid to use your mobile email signature if you're on the go and make your life easier. If you don't feel the standard Sent from my iPhone or if you're using another mobile device, you can always create your own sign-in that follows the same general logic: Apology/Location/Status [Notification] from [My] [Device]. Need inspiration? Here are some examples of our favorite creative mobile email signatures (h/t Atlantic): Sent from your phone. Regularly not implemented by autocorrect.
